at two projects that aim to show the election so people can make their choices shows just how much the campaign can shape voting patterns. Both projects are sponsored by The New York Times. The Times has deep experience in election coverage. It once covered candidates for the New York State Assembly in the 1950s and has been producing thousands of stories about the presidential contest since the election was decided in 2004. So when the newspaper decided to create election projects this year, it chose only a few: California, Florida, Michigan and Ohio. The Times describes the projects as a departure from its broader coverage of politics and government. But they are built in the same vein as projects that have been doing election coverage for decades./
