Genoa as riot police use tear gas to disperse clashes with protesters calling for a new government. Protesters took to the streets in Genoa, Italy, on Saturday to protest austerity measures imposed by the country's new leaders. The new leader of Italy's populist Northern League party, Matteo Salvini, has ruled out cooperation with the governing center-left and the main opposition party in the country, even as Europe and the United States struggle to contain the coronavirus outbreak. In the Democratic Party — the governing party which is itself a coalition of leftist parties — Angela Merkel's Christian Democrats and the Social Democrats have also formally ruled out any cooperation with Salvini's Northern League. Why the deal is on the brink of collapse This came as Italy's ruling center-left and center-right parties — in a tie vote — were set to elect a new government on Sunday, after three rounds of talks aimed at reaching a coalition deal failed. The last-minute talks are reported to have been held Friday between both sides, with European Commission President Ursula von der Leyen — who has “expressed the Commission's readiness to consider any proposed cooperation between Italy and the EU” — and the leaders of the Democratic Party and the Northern League present. As this deal is at the brink of collapse, the center-left and center-right parties also expressed support for the European Union to determine Italy's electoral rules. This would allow pro-Europeans to be elected, to break the deadlock and prevent the appointment of a new government made up of parties not previously elected in Italy. Italy in chaos over coalition talks 2d92ce491b
