The 36-year-old "The Killing" star, who took on the role of Rick Flagg in the May 2014 reboot of the long-running action franchise, recently spoke about his return to the desert wasteland. Speaking to a magazine, he said: "It's been a very, very good thing to be back in an environment where it's more or less constant. The car's on fire, I'm trying to find water, a sabre tooth tiger is following me, or a better way to put it, a tornado is chasing me. "The only things that have changed are the car and the truck and the CGI of the monster. Everything else has been the same. You see a few trees, you see a few rocks, you see a few cars that are missing their doors or tires. "You're in an environment where the earth is becoming more difficult to manage, and the world is becoming a little more difficult to manage. I feel like I'm a film student again. The difference is that this is a film that has lasted for years and has an entire history that goes back to the original. "For me, the most important thing was to be in the world, in the elements and to be in the community. In my case, in the case of the 'Mad Max' movie, it was in the community, in the place where people live. The highway is the place where people live." Kinnaman stars alongside Tom Hardy, Charlize Theron and Nicholas Hoult in "Mad Max" reboot "Mad Max: Fury Road." The film, which co-stars Rosie Huntington-Whiteley and shows off its apocalyptic visuals in high-def, hits theaters
