Oct 11, 2013 I'll be offline for approximately 2 weeks starting this Friday at. -wizual-custmnt-for-portable-devices-x86-and-x64-x86-64-x86.Q: Is it possible to extract the frames with empty columns from a video I want to extract the frames with only background but have no idea how to do it. A: One way is to use a UIImagePickerControllerController which will allow you to quickly get image frames of the video. In iOS 5 and later you can use the appropriate built-in APIs directly. For example, in iOS 9 and later, you could call AVAssetImageGenerator, or in iOS 7 and earlier, you could use AVPlayerItem and the AVPlayerItemAccessLog property. To get frames with only the background, you would probably need to manually compute the background frame from the image frames. Q:

How to tell if a procedure is split into multiple procedures? How do I tell whether a procedure that I have been given has been split into multiple procedures? For example, SET @SQL = 'SELECT name, place FROM MyTable' EXEC @returnVal = [SP_MyStoredProc] @sql According to MSDN, SP_MyStoredProc is an internal, undocumented procedure. Is there some way of discovering it? A: Using T-SQL, no. You can examine the code with a decompiler, but there is no way that I know of to determine that based on the code. MSDN Documentation is available for many of their system stored procedures. If you can find a reference for this stored procedure there, it will likely tell you the best way to determine whether or not it has been split. You can search the list of their system procedures here. Also, rather than using EXEC @returnVal =, use SELECT @@ROWCOUNT. The results can be queried via sys.dm_exec_describe_first_result_set(). This query can be used to determine the value of @returnVal so you don't need to "check the output", as suggested by another answer. .find("offline-reload").on("click", function() ba244e880a
