Category:Windows-only software Category:Windows security software Category:Windows-only freewareQ: Can the same target be a free PC for two simultaneous spell slots? Can a single PC have both of his or her spell slots used on the same target? Or is one target slot restricted to one spell, and the other to a different spell? A: Yes, each spell slot has a specific type, but any spell can be cast on any target. As long as you have enough slots for it. A spellcaster must have a spell slot to cast a spell. The spellcaster selects the slot from the slot list and casts the spell. If a spell has more than one target, you must choose one of them for the spell to affect. You can target the same creature, an adjacent creature, or a creature that isn't in the same place as a creature you targeted previously. This is important because there are multiple ways to cast spells, such as the sorcerer's haste spell, which makes it so that you can cast it in a single turn. In this case, the spellcasting ability can provide you with an additional option for a spell you can cast, so that you can use it once it's prepared. A: Yes, each slot has a specific type. If a spell has multiple targets, it must be cast on a target of the specific type listed in the spell description. This isn't a hard and fast rule, and there are a couple of spells that would be okay to cast if one target was a valid target for two spells. For example, the sorcerer's haste spell says: Prepared Spell. When the sorcerer casts a spell that has a range of self and is not a spell that requires components, he can spend 2 ki as a bonus action to cast the spell using a slot, rather than taking the time to prepare the spell. For example, a sorcerer can spend 2 ki as a bonus action to cast haste on herself. When the spell ends or the bonus action is taken, the expended ki is lost. The spell requires two targets and haste can be cast on a single target, so one target can be used for two different spells. It's probably not a great idea, since there's a limit of 5 ki, but you can do it. Q 2d92ce491b
