Maureen Dowd appeared on NBC News this morning to address President Obama's National Security Agency revelations, and she gave an interesting take on what privacy in 2014 means. As MSNBC host Stephanie Ruhle pointed out to Dowd, if someone were to assume your phone is hacked by the FBI, the NSA or any other law enforcement agency, the phone company would have to give up the contents of your messages, and many companies have done so.

"Even if the government is listening to your e-mail messages and your phone records, it probably isn't breaking into your house," Dowd said. But she continued to remark that Americans like to think of themselves as inviolate "no matter what." Ruhle wanted to know: What does that mean? If the government is spying on you, what protections are you concerned about? "I think it means that we believe in our civil liberties as much as we believe in our religious liberties," she answered. "I mean I don't get a titillated by the idea of the government snooping on me." She continued: "What should I do if the FBI wants to question me? I'll take 'em to court. I'll challenge the FBI. I'll say: 'Can you prove that I committed a crime?' I'll say, 'How do you come to my door, how did you listen to me talking to my friend if I'm home?'"

Ruhle concluded: "It seems to me that we think of ourselves as inviolate, but we're not. We're not. We are not even to a point of absolutes." Watch the full interview above. God Bless America? USA
