The schedule each player has been working so hard to hit is almost over for this year, a lot of the team talk amongst the players is about who is going to be in their group or who is going to be at the last legs of the group. The deadline is July 5th so players can still make a final decision after that. I'm not a believer of the show and tell of articles, such as this one, for common players to be the jack of all trades in order to become the master of all trades. I feel that it's a overkill. I know this is not a topic of discussion at all but with the recent exposure of some of the most common gaming trolls on the AAR, I'm aware of the fact that some players will try to use their gaming account as a means to troll and harass fellow players online or even in game chat and they will go after the gameplay themselves. I have seen some bad behavior where a player will be on the chat system and with the resources they have they will go out of their way to end other players. I know that's the nature of a gaming community and not everyone has the mentality to be a nice person but that does not mean the gaming community is a safe zone and everyone is accepting of other players. What is the best way to curb these activities? Is banning these players a good solution? Let's just say I'm not a big fan of these kind of actions. If you see someone using their account to abuse someone or themselves in any other way, just let them know it is not acceptable. With anything you do online, there will be consequences. If you want to give constructive criticism to a player, try to find a solution, not a way to ridicule a player. If a player is making progress and is posting constructive criticism, the best you can do is to mention that and state that you will keep an eye on them. If you think someone is making jokes or other kinds of comments that may be considered to be trolling, just let the player know they are not funny and it's not acceptable and you will not tolerate it from them. It is great if a player has
