The present invention is directed to a steerable beverage dispenser and more particularly to a swivel stopper for use with the dispenser. One of the many problems in the development of automated dispensing machinery is the need to provide a dispenser which has a mechanism for permitting free flow of a liquid to be dispensed so that the liquid does not build up in the dispenser which could effect a malfunction of the dispenser. Certain types of dispensers, for example, those which utilize a vapor pressure within the liquid to effect the dispensing of the liquid, such as the dispensing of beer, cannot maintain a constant level within the dispenser while dispensing and therefore, a hole or apertures must be provided for the free flow of the liquid. In other cases, it is desirable to provide the dispenser with a large, unobstructed delivery opening to receive liquid from a container. Such dispensers are desirable, for example, in areas where large volume users are located and it is necessary for the dispenser to be able to deliver large amounts of liquid during a short time period. In both cases, the opening through which the liquid is dispensed must be capable of being sealed to prevent the escape of the liquid while the dispenser is not in operation. A primary problem with existing dispensers is the provision of a mechanism which allows the user to open and close the dispenser to obtain a drink. Dispensers often employ a closure cap which is attached to the dispenser by a hinge. The cap
