Rajamani AS, Physics for Engineering Students, Textbook, Series, Ohmsha, Bramha S., Health and education, Textbook, Series. J.A.. Science in Java, Second Edition, Lawrence Erlbaum Associates, Inc, Cementing social roles in American society is the norm, according to a new report that suggests that a large percentage of pre-college young adults are still dating by their senior year. The study comes in the wake of a similar report from earlier this year which suggests that unmarried couples are nearly as common as married couples in the U.S. According to the report, which is based on data from researchers at the Institute of Marriage and Family for the National Institute of Health, 88% of men and 81% of women have had some form of romantic contact with a partner before their senior year in college. While these numbers might seem out of date, they're actually relatively recent according to the researchers. In 2011, 80% of college students had pre-college partners. In other words, pre-college dating is still a pretty common practice in America, but so are pre-college marriages. What these data doesn't tell us, however, is the actual number of students who are currently dating before college, a lack of information that is illustrated by the fact that this article has only one image for you to look at. This isn't to say that more young people are currently dating before college, or that more are getting married after college. What is happening is that when the research team did their study, they analyzed data from people in their late 20
