What's New In?

Q: How can I get data from a single cell? I have to code a basic search bar for my web application. It's being written in RoR as a web interface to a database. When a user types in a search bar, how can I pass the data into a query that pulls data that matches their search query? I want to be able to pull data from a single cell, for example, student name or school and return that data on a page. I'm also using the `:remote => true` option on the `form_tag`. A: You just need to have the data you want stored in a variable that can be passed to the query.

something like: `#search page :get) do %> nil %>` and then you'll have this in the controller: `def search params[:query] = "#{params[:query]}*";`

search_data =

Student.find_by_sql(params[:query]) # send back the data as JSON end Q: What are the precipitating agents? I know that the most widely used reagent for the Precipitation Reaction is Mono-Ethyl Ether (MEM). I was wondering, do there are other reagents that can be used in place of MEM? Are there any problems when using

MEM instead of one of the other monoprecipitating agents? A: There are many others.

In order of popularity I think I would list:

Methanol Large quantities of water are added to form a supersaturated solution. Hence, the success of this method depends on the volatility of the acid to the ether. Can be used for alkaloids and amino acid analysis. Butanol Can be used as an alternative to ethyl acetate for the quantitative extraction of
