Stephen Glover, vice chairman of the Committee of Advertising Practice (CAP), the watchdog that bans adverts for alcohol, tobacco and porn, has resigned from the watchdog just as it is considering banning an advert that is 'injurious to health'. Glover's resignation as the vice-chairman of the body that sets the standards for advertising comes days after the CAP blocked a campaign for Cadbury's Fruit and Nut bars, in spite of the company putting its name to the advert. Responding to criticism over its decision, the CAP argued that giving a commercial company the rights to advertise its products is an 'important part of modern communications'. The latest statistics show the CAP spent a colossal £222,000 on its own office in 2013 – more than double the amount it spent 10 years earlier. As with all organisations with corporate status in the UK, the CAP is taxpayer-funded. By contrast, the Royal Society of Public Health, which receives £13.5 million a year from the government, spent just £80 82138339de
