evidence for taurine in guinea-pig brain membranes.

Immunofluorescence, electrophoresis and isoelectric focusing studies were used to

compare the distribution of taurine in whole brain, synaptosomes and myelin-rich fractions of guinea-pig brains with that in other species of mammals, including man, suggesting that the presence of this amino acid is common to the entire group. Guinea-pig brain membranes were shown to contain a large proportion of free taurine which could be estimated at about 5% of the total amino acid content. The immunofluorescence staining of thin sections indicated the occurrence of taurine in synaptosomes and myelin. The presence of the amino acid in microvilli and cytoplasmic granules was demonstrated by electron microscopy. The high level of taurine in brain membranes contrasts with the low levels of this amino acid in other tissues and the low turnover of taurine in brain.

---

The possible implications of the presence of taurine in brain membranes are discussed.Q:
