Short on time? Grownups still the ones who rush to their car every few minutes Since 1900, every generation has gotten better at sticking to a schedule, but no one takes tomorrow as seriously as we do, a new study has found. The study found that while we have been getting better at sticking to our schedules, we are also getting faster, with many people now driving twice as fast as they did in the 1950s. In 1960, 8% of American adults walked, ran or biked to work. Now, that number is down to 5%. In the 1950s, the average work commute was approximately 9.8 minutes. Now, it's closer to 32 minutes. Modern research has found that light-footed students and long-haul truck drivers might be more likely to have their cars stolen than long-haul bus or subway drivers, and that the best defenses against car theft are to park in well-lit, well-monitored parking lots and to avoid leaving valuables inside the car. But, in the '60s, the average time spent on homework by American kids was one hour and 22 minutes, and nearly half of them "failed to get into college" while in high school, compared to just 7.4% now. The study, titled "The Changing Relationship Between Time and Drive," was conducted by Princeton University and published in the journal Public Opinion Quarterly. The study, conducted over a 20 year period, found that since 1960, Americans have been increasing their drive times at a rate of one to three minutes per decade. The researchers believe that the increase in car ownership since the mid-60s has led to the increase in average commute times. Additionally, the researchers found that our increasing drive times could be attributed to the increase of the number of people who leave work each day at 4 p.m. instead of 4:30 p.m.Youtube Video The iPhone might be the most beloved smart device to date, and the cartoon Steve Jobs would agree.
