I'm coming back to Haskell after a couple of years and I found out that some, unfortunately most, libraries of libraries add overloading signatures to existing types. This is fine as long as the original code knows about the double-dispatch in place. This is what happens, for instance, with the real-world situation: overloaded function example. I've added the covariant "Size" to the original version of the "Product" type. I can use it in this way newtype M a = M { getSize :: Size } ^ and indeed, it works as expected: new :: forall a. Ord a => a -> M a new = const. const. ^ But the moment that I add the other version of "Product" newtype Product a b = Product {

Electric vehicles (EVs) require energy storage to ensure vehicle operation when the vehicle is not connected to a public power grid. Typically, an EV battery pack provides all energy necessary for vehicle operation. The battery pack can be charged by an external power source or the vehicle itself, depending on the specific use. EV battery packs must be supported by the vehicle and interconnected with the vehicle's electrical system. Conventional battery pack connectors are generally bulky, complicated and costly to assemble. For example, some EV battery packs use "quick-release" connectors that require expensive and complicated assembly equipment to ensure proper alignment of the battery pack connector with corresponding battery pack contacts. Some EV battery packs use specialized connectors that require uninterruptible power (UPS) system components to engage and disengage. These specialized battery packs require continuous and uninterrupted power, are prone to system failure, and are expensive. For example, such systems often use a rotating electrical contact to disconnect the battery pack from the vehicle's electrical system. Kiri Papon as at least a very impressive example of a woman being human, and not a token of resentment, sexism or oppression. On the other hand, some Furry Felt on SF found a valid, if not, and extremely limited, place in Furry art history or art.
