Field of the Invention The present invention relates to an imaging system which includes a video camera and a programmable host computer. 2. Description of the Prior Art Video cameras which provide a picture on a video screen and which are connected to a programmable host computer are generally known and in widespread use. Such cameras often include a videotape recorder and an electrical interface module which controls the operations of the videotape recorder. In such a camera, a cassette containing a video tape on which a video signal has been recorded is loaded into the videotape recorder, and a program, i.e. a video signal, recorded on the video tape, is reproduced and displayed on the video screen of the camera. To view a reproduced picture which has been recorded on the video tape, a user must turn on a switch to energize the videotape recorder. When a picture which has been recorded on the video tape is to be reviewed, the videotape recorder is energized and the picture is reproduced on a video screen of a monitor. Then, when the user wants to save the reproduced picture on the video tape, for example, in order to record a still picture on the videotape, the videotape recorder is again energized. In such a known arrangement, if one wants to record a picture on the video tape, the videotape recorder must be energized. On the other hand, if one only wishes to review 595f342e71
