Unfortunate. That's the only way I can describe my eyesight right now. Technically, I can see. For the most part. Not correctly. But I can see. It's just not the way I thought it would be when I got blind. I woke up the other morning with a dry, scratchy eye. I looked in the mirror and was surprised to see how the left side of my face looked completely different than the right side. What looked like a window of brown shot across my cheek. I didn't understand it, but it didn't phase me. I had more important things to focus on. I'm going to save that story for next week's blog. It's a story I really want to share. And I will, in time. But this is about something else. Something that I need to share. The cost of LASIK It's like you're jumping out of a plane. And you hear the wind blowing through the cord, and as you do, you feel the pull of the parachute. As you jump, you're looking for a door to help you in case you need it. It's still there. You just don't know it yet. The process is simple. Your eyes get fixed. Suddenly, you can see. And you have to be careful. This is a change that is neither good nor bad. It's just different. After all, it's not as though you put your kid in the hospital to give them sight. In fact, the whole idea was pretty crazy when the doctor tells you you'll be so happy you'll cry tears of joy. They're not lying. They're telling you the truth. Even when I had my LASIK done, it wasn't a problem. My vision was fine. It was excellent. But now it's not. And there are some changes that are happening in my eye to make that happen. What I don't want to do You see, what I don't want to do is be disappointed in myself and say that I see something but it doesn't look right. It's more the other way around. I see something that I expect and then it doesn't look right
