Q: Javascript Objects, Best Practices I'm reading about Javascript best practices, and it seems like some of the frameworks are heavily using Objects. Is it good practice to just use Objects.prototype.some_function() and not have a specific instance of the object, or is having objects with specific instances more beneficial?

A: I think it is best practice to create an object if you need one. It lets you encapsulate values and extend functionality to parts of the object without the user needing to know about that. In the object below, it is likely that the "contexts" object will change and I don't want to have to edit both when I add a new context. So I might create an object that encapsulates a bunch of common functionality for a Context object, and pass that. //object context.js function Context() { this.content = ""; this.template = ""; } Context.prototype.setContent = function(value) { this.content = value; }
Context.prototype.setTemplate = function(value) { this.template = value; }
Then elsewhere in the code, I can do: var context = new Context();
context.setTemplate('Some template');
context.setContent('Some content'); //later
context.setContent('Another content');
context.setTemplate('Yet another template');
The benefit of this is I don't have to change the code each time I add new functionality to the context object, as I would have to if I just used a single function.

Dual-sensor smart virtual reality helmet featuring integrated 3D displays and head-tracking. We present a compact and energy-efficient head-worn virtual reality (VR) helmet that integrates stereoscopic displays and passive head-tracking. Its sensing module consists of a time-of-flight (ToF) range sensor, which is used for obtaining the 3D position of the user's head in space. Simultaneously, the sensor provides an image-based depth map that is processed into the user's current view at the display. A Foveated ToF-based rendering is employed to enhance the quality of the displayed virtual images. An array of eight photodiodes is used for passive head-tracking. They provide a coarse user position,

Q: How can I deal with a security breach resulting in fraudulent actions on my site? We're a Drupal shop with a number of clients. We recently discovered a vulnerability in one of our sites and made a patch. During this time, a small number of requests have been made which are attempting to exploit this vulnerability. There doesn't seem to be a pattern to the requests, all have been through one of our large enterprise clients and so are all coming in through our company's VPN, so it's been possible to see which client it came from. This has resulted in a large number of emails being sent to us in recent days, most containing a screenshot of our site and asking the client to verify their username and password. We have now been confronted with a situation where a security breach on the client's site has apparently resulted in activity on our site that's completely false. What's the best way to inform the client of this? I have forwarded this to the client, but have received no response. How can I best proceed to handle this?

A: If you don't have some way of certifying your user's identity, you should change your login system to protect against the possibility of leaking the usernames and passwords of your users to someone who gained access to the network. If you don't already do this, I suggest that you search your code for all usernames and passwords, and then hash them so that they can't be easily read. You can then use those hashed, hasselblackened-out data points to store credentials, rather than storing the actual username/password combo. Do this for all users, even the ones outside of your network. If the client site has a login system of their own, consider two things here. If you don't already have a way of verifying your user's identity, it's possible that the client has changed his password, either intentionally or in an attempt to find a duplicate. It's possible that there's another user on the client's site who has access to the database and is using the same username and password as the client's actual user. In either of these cases, you may want to contact the client and inquire as to whether you can reset their password. If the client has not changed their password, then it may be the case that they have somehow copied the entire database and manipulated it into a form where your original data is no longer valid. In either of these cases
