1. Figure 1-25: Pick Image > Adjustments > Posterize. 2. Figure 1-26: Use the brush tools to draw a selection across the edges of the flower in a lightly shaded orange color. 3. Figure 1-27: Use the eye dropper tool to choose the color Orange from the new posterize color palette. Choose Edit > Copy to duplicate the layer. Name it Posterize Selection so you know you have a duplicate posterize layer for future use. Your art is already complete! You can save your file. 3. Figure 1-28: Convert the layer to a selection by choosing Layer > Layer Mask > Make Selection. #

Stabilizing Art Adobe Photoshop allows you to stabilize art, meaning that you can freeze in certain areas of an image — especially a large brush stroke — so that the image doesn't distort when viewing the image at different angles. You can see an example in Figure 1-29. I chose a large brush stroke in a yellowish color. The color is a very bright yellow, so it will show up more on the computer monitor than the actual print. The image was created using layer masks, so I have the yellowish-orange selection remaining visible so you can see the previous version. Figure 1-29 shows the effect of stabilizing the image. I painted over the stabilizing brush and this improved the image. Stabilizing is especially helpful when you use a brush over any area of a picture. When you're painting with a brush, you have to choose your brush size wisely, since as the brush strokes get larger, the larger the area covered. If you don't want to use stabilizing, don't worry. You can just deselect the layer mask to cancel its effect and your stabilizing area will still be visible. However, while you can add and subtract color from layers in the Layers window, you can't modify or even change the original masking layers. So, if you want to use masks again, you need to create new layers, fill them with color, and change the layer masks.

Q: How to get property of an object using the property name as a string I have a string that contains the property name, I also have the object that I need to get the property from. How can I get the value of the property using the property name as a string. The property name is stored in a string. The object looks like this: `var theObject = { 'property1' : 'value1', 'property2' : 'value2', 'property3' : 'value3', 'property4' : 'value4', 'property5' : 'value5' }` I need to get the property value from the Object, I'm currently using a switch statement to try and get the property value, the switch block looks like this: `var myValue = null; var propertyName = "property1"; if (propertyName in theObject) { myValue = theObject[propertyName]; }` The above does not work as I am not using the property name, I'm actually just using 'property1' to get the property value. Can I specify the property I'm looking to get the value from with out using a switch statement. I don't want to have to store a list of all the property names in the object. A: You can use `getOwnPropertyNames` `var theObject = { 'property1' : 'value1', 'property2' : 'value2',`
