Easier transitions between formations; the new formation experience will better reflect the reality of football matches; and added positional play. "This year, we think we've taken team AI to a whole new level. We've been able to get the most out of the data we collected to bring about significant gameplay changes and we've been able to do this with the help of new player AI that's been developed at our game design studios," said Albert Roca, Head of FIFA. "We've also been able to develop a new AI system that will contribute to the 'can't-afford-to-give-up' situations the FIFA community has come to know and love." Goalkeepers are also going to be even more aware of those small details that can make or break a game. The new goalkeeper AI is designed to react better than ever before. "The goalkeeper is one of the most important players on the pitch. If he's there to catch, it's a good thing. But if he does something wrong, we don't want players to abuse him. So we've improved the feedback system to make sure the goalkeeper knows what's going on and can adapt his way of play accordingly."

Although FIFA 20 took a huge leap in AI, there were still some areas of the game that FIFA's Senior Producer and Co-Creative Director at EA Canada needed to improve. "If you take a look at any of the EA Sports titles, there's still a lot of room for improvement. One of the biggest things we have to work on is player animation." We at PlayStation.Blog want to see the video below and want to know what you think. The topic of "Player Leveling" was not even mentioned in the post. What do you think?
