We present results of an application of a three-dimensional, finite-element dynamic hydrogeological model, which incorporates the effects of lithospheric structure and mineral reactivation, to the operation of Yucca Mountain, Nevada (USA). The field data used in the model includes a large number of tracer tests, obtained with flow cells, across the waste level and the underlying sedimentary and volcanic units, and 14 boreholes with finely spaced logs. The model predicts the flux of relevant groundwater tracers (generally, Tc-99, Na-24, and Cs-137, the last two only after a careful treatment) through the system. The waste level model results are consistent with those from a 3-D conductivity model, and both models are consistent with that of a limited-source model. In addition, we show that the hydrogeological model is able to reproduce the temporal variation of the sodium and boron fluxes for the borehole tests where full hydraulic conductivity measurements could be made. Quemath: a learning environment for development of applications to health from biomedicine to biotechnology. This paper reports on the design and current evaluation of a new method for the modelling of biological systems and their interactions with other components, based on the Karel Doornik model. Quemath is a prototype for an integrated environment for the development of applications in the life sciences, that includes a model building tool and an interactive system for execution of applications on a personal computer, without programming. It currently builds models of biological systems at three different levels of abstraction: nucleic acids, proteins and cells. It allows users to configure and execute the applications once they are built, and for the results from execution to be stored in a user-defined hierarchical format, providing a simple mechanism for the documentation and maintenance of the results from simulation. Quemath was developed in The Netherlands, and has been evaluated on a number of biological systems and on the 1cdb36666d
