"The first thing I did was thank my lucky stars that we made it through, because there were times when the reality of what had happened settled over me," Shearer said. "We were in places where it was literally hand-to-hand combat. We were dodging bullets." Shearer knows the big difference between the "real" World War II and a fake war for journalists is that the real war took place over a much longer period of time and spread over a much bigger area. "At home, we don't often think about the great things that were happening in the world," Shearer said. "For the film, we tried to recreate those times - but over the course of two years. To me, that's very important." The World War II combat film also gets a personal connection because of the director's connection with R. Lee Ermey, who played the tough sergeant major named Gunnery Sergeant Hartman in Kubrick's "Full Metal Jacket." "I first met Lee Ermey at a luncheon during the film," said Shearer. "He was intimidating. But what he did give me was the sense that he was approachable." Twenty-two years later, Ermey played the commanding sergeant in Shearer's "Act of Valor." "It was kind of nice to see someone from 'Full Metal Jacket' - even if they were a little intimidating," Shearer said. "He was great. He had an easygoing personality." The film is also "coming out at a time when American politics are going through a pretty ugly time," she said. "People are separated by a common enemy - their government." Shearer considers the film a "parallel political thriller," made in the style of a World War II documentary. "It was a huge logistical challenge. We started filming in November and wrapped in May. We had to get the footage back in a month, and finish it in time for a theatrical release. And all that in the middle of a political campaign." A special thanks to the Fort Lauderdale Center for the Performing Arts for making available the Masquerade venue for the Fall PR event.
